

The Real American War in Vietnam

Nick Turse

7 PM Monday
3 March 2014
UNC-Chapel Hill

Nelson Mandela Auditorium
FedEx Global Education Center
301 Pittsboro Street

Award-winning journalist and fellow at the Nation Institute, Nick Turse holds a PhD in Sociomedical Sciences from Columbia University.

“Nick Turse reminds us ... in this painful and important book, why war should always be a last resort, and especially wars that have little to do with American national security. We failed, as Turse makes clear, to deal after the Vietnam War with the murders that took place, and today – four decades later -- the lessons have yet to be learned.”

Seymour Hersh, staff writer, The New Yorker

Sponsored by UNC-CH’s Southeast Asian Approaches Faculty Working Group, the Center for Global Initiatives, the Carolina Asia Center, Feminist Students United, the Social and Economic Justice minor, the Departments of History and Sociology, the Institute for the Arts and Humanities, Students for a Democratic Society, as well as Veterans for Peace (Chapter 157).